Old Mr. Jack is sitting in the park when he clearly hears a cat fetching a bird not far from him.

Mr. Jack intervenes to save the bird only to discover that it's not any bird: it's the bird of death, that has come to tell him it's time to go.

However, touched by the kindness of Mr. Jack, the bird is ready to fulfill his last wish: Mr. Jack asks then to see his wife once again.

The bird gladly makes his wish come true. It gives Mr. Jack a small black stone and told him to put it under his pillow every first day of each month. The procedure works and Mr. Jack will see his wife again.

Jack's kindness had the power to change his destiny.

A story in which love and death are inextricably linked, between dream and reality.

Two little brothers are troubled because their mother is ill. They read in their grandfather book that in France there's a magical dog, called Guinefort, who could heal their mother. They decided to do whatever it takes to find this dog. They prepare all the necessary to set off on a journey: a compass, some rope, pencils, a notebook, a camera and of course, a lot of chocolate.

Convinced to have gone to France (but actually they'll travel across their neighborhood), the kids will find Guinefort and the mother will be healed.

A classic children tale dressed up in a modern setting about care, brotherhood, courage, determination and growth.

Guinefort takes inspiration from a medieval legend of the XIII century. A rich merchant from Lion leaves his dog to guard the cradle of his son. When he returns home, he finds the cradle empty and covered with blood: he thinks that his dog attacked his child. Blinded by pain, the man kills Guinefort – only to find a dead viper near the cradle, killed by his dog to save his son. From that day on, Guinefort became the protector of children.
